All the Time in the World

We've got all the time in the world,
All the world in our time,
So while we're here let's
Enjoy the time of our lives.
Some days you feel like you're movin'
Some days like you're standin' still
Some days yet can be so fine,
And others just never will.
Oh when we move in, and we turn around,
And we fly right down to ourselves,
Well you know I like to feel so good,
And it feels the best with you.

Written in the 1930's by S. I. Hsiung, a Chinese scholar, LADY PRECIOUS STREAM brought the flavor of classic Chinese drama to New York and London where it enjoyed successful runs. We attempted to maintain that flavor as much as possible in our production.

The traditional stage was an open platform surmounted by a roof supported by columns and surrounded by a low railing. All of these features were derived from the earliest Chinese stages—a temple porch with a roof. There were always two doors in the rear wall, and the stage was furnished simply—a few chairs, perhaps a table, and some simple hand props. These few props were always handled and placed by "invisible" prop men, dressed in black, who waited on the actor's every need, including offering a cup of tea after a particularly long speech. The unusual and non-realistic makeup was another challenge for us, as was incorporating a few of the stylized movements and gestures of the classic Chinese actors. Finally, we have incorporated recorded music instead of live accompaniment as would have occurred on the original stages. K.B.

The processional in medieval splendor winds through the lofty hall as we toast the Christmastide in the celebration of our annual Madrigal Dinner. Remembrance of things past is one of the cherished traditions of this time of year -- we halt our busy strivings toward the future, and deliberately seek out the color and beauty of that more leisurely day when Christmas was the celebration of a heartfelt idea, and part-singing was the pastime of friends whenever they gathered for social pleasure -- when madrigals were a part of daily life, not relegated to the stage and special singers.

Here we momentarily relive in authentic recreation the customs, the music and the costumes of centuries ago, withal expressing our hearty good wishes for the Christmas Season filled with joy and meaning.
