ALUMNUS FOUND OUTDOOR CALLING AT UNI
Advances in technology and social media have made it incredibly easy to stay connected with former classmates. I substitute phone calls with voyeuristic glimpses into friends’ and families’ lives, but do not have a real opportunity to reminisce, joke and truly connect. There is such a difference in hearing a familiar laugh and seeing a smile in real time.

My favorite part of my job is watching people connect. It happens at nearly every event. I will be talking with an alumnus/a about their time on campus and someone will come over and grab them on the shoulder and say, “There’s someone I haven’t seen in ages! How are you?” Then they will go into this amazing narrative about living across the hall from each other, discussing favorite memories sledding down the hill with lunch trays, or even remembering skinny dipping in Prexy’s Pond (I have heard some stories that have made me blush)! It is a true gift to watch friends reconnect and witness, even just for a moment, a near time travel back to their time on campus. I get to see these glimpses of the past, be it the memories of living in Stadium Hall to more recent memories of a proposal at the Campanile.

I was lucky enough to experience a real-time connection at an alumni event in Chicago. I was greeting UNI alumni at the door when a woman walked in with a familiar last name and face. But, in my mind, this couldn’t be my elementary school band director—she’s far too young. I started to talk with her and asked where she was from and what she did for a living. She was a retired elementary school band instructor from Waterloo. It was Ms. Whitehead, my greatly admired and adored fifth grade band teacher. It was a gift for us to reconnect. All of a sudden the gap of two decades melted. What a joy.

ALUMNUS FOUND OUTDOOR CALLING AT UNI
Sam Braband, ’10 says we shouldn’t “pigeonhole” his alma mater. UNI’s offerings aren’t limited to its outstanding education and business programs.

“UNI provides lots of great experiences for a wide range of graduates. It prepared me for my career in the wilderness,” Sam said.

Originally from Clive, Sam has been working for the past five months as an Alaska State Park Ranger for the Fairbanks area. He graduated from UNI with a degree in leisure, youth and human services.

Sam knew what he wanted to do from the second day he was on campus. That first day, though, was a little different.

“I came in as a pre-nursing major,” Sam laughed. A meeting with an advisor from the biology department followed a dizzying first day of anatomy class. When Sam said he didn’t think the major was right for him, he was asked about his interests.

“I proceeded to describe basically what I’m doing today; I knew I wanted to work outside,” Sam said.

The advisor helped Sam switch his major the second day of class and he would go on to graduate with an emphasis in outdoor recreation.
On the Job

It was the National Student Exchange program that gave Sam his first taste of Alaska; his junior year he enrolled in outdoor studies at the University of Alaska Southeast in Juneau. After graduating from UNI, he took a position managing the outdoor recreation program at the University of Alaska Fairbanks before becoming a park ranger.

“It feels good to be doing what I wanted to be doing all along.”

Sam and just two other rangers oversee the northern Alaska state parks, some 250,000 acres of land north of the Denali National Park and Preserve. It’s a wilderness (“the people who actually live here don’t consider it ‘wilderness’ because it’s just their back yard”) crawling with fauna, from beavers, lynx and willow grouse to wolves, grizzlies and black bears. On occasion, the hooves of hundreds of caribou do the work of the ranger, carving out passable trails to be enjoyed by human users.

A park ranger is both a resource manager and a law enforcement officer. The theme of the job, Sam says, is never knowing what to expect.

He described a recent rather mundane morning of snowplowing trails that quickly turned to a whirlwind afternoon hunt for a bandit who had stolen gas from the Department of Natural Resources and a few other offices located within Sam’s jurisdiction. Teamwork among the rangers, state troopers and other agencies had the thief in custody by the end of the afternoon.

Another day was filled by a more unusual adventure: a six-mile odyssey through the harsh Alaskan bush to deliver a fresh outhouse to a rental cabin.

“No, that’s not something I thought I’d be doing when I graduated from UNI,” Sam chuckled. “But that’s the name of the game.”
Finding Himself at UNI

Sam found plenty of opportunities at UNI that set him on his career path. He led backpacking trips to the Grand Canyon as a student with the UNI Outdoors Program, participated in a tallgrass prairie burn and helped construct a trail system as part of a managing impacts on natural resources course.

Sam says Kathy Scholl, associate professor of leisure, youth and human services, inspired him to work with natural resources.

“She was instrumental in identifying that passion in me and making it a career.”

He also found his wife of seven years, Stacy, within the confines of the Wellness and Recreation Center.

“I worked at the climbing wall in the WRC and she taught Pilates classes. Of course, I had to walk past the open glass group fitness studios to get to the climbing wall,” Sam said. The pair noticed each other and connected through a mutual friend.

The two caught a lecture at the Gallagher Bluedorn Performing Arts Center and shared their first date over a beer at Toad’s Bar and Grill on Main Street. More than 3,000 miles and about 10 years later, they and their three children have made their home among a great community in Fairbanks.

“For someone who loves the outdoors, it’s nice to know you’re on the frontier of America’s biggest wilderness — and to have it so close by,” Sam said.

Enjoying the Outdoors

Sam believes we should all do our best to appreciate the outdoors while we can. Though many of us take part by way of a simple hike, Sam is different, a bit of a self-described adrenaline junkie.

One of his more exhilarating adventures was climbing the frozen Bridal Veil Falls near Valdez, Alaska. The waterfall stands nearly 500 feet.

Asked if he considers that dangerous, Sam replied matter-of-factly, “It’s all about your sphere of acceptable risk.”

Sam’s quick to mention he even learned ice climbing while at UNI—rather than an Alaskan waterfall, it was an ice-covered silo in the middle of an Iowa winter. UNI
The Friends of the UNI Permanent Art Collection and Gallery—an 18-member group of UNI alumni, students and other supporters of art—formed in August with a goal of preserving, expanding and increasing awareness of UNI’s Permanent Art Collection, a storehouse of more than 4,000-piece cross section of art history from the 15th century to the present day.

The group’s first campaign is to solicit $55,000 in funds to conserve 44 fragile works of art in danger of being lost to time. The list includes works by history’s greatest artists: Picasso, Rembrandt, Matisse and Grant Wood.

“It can be heartbreaking to look at a work of art that may be beyond repair,” said Darrell Taylor, UNI Art Gallery director and overseer of the Permanent Art Collection. “Or perhaps it’s the case that you can stabilize it, but even after stabilization it can’t be viewed in an exhibition setting.”

‘RISK OF FURTHER DAMAGE’

Taylor and the Friends group have raised over $27,000 toward a 50/50 matching grant offered by the Institute for Museum and Library Services. The present mission is the result of a previous Institute for Museum and Library Services grant that funded a condition assessment of the Permanent Art Collection’s approximately 2,400 works on paper. From that assessment, the list of 44 high-priority works was compiled based on each piece’s condition as well as status within the collection.

“There is a risk of further damage if these works aren’t conserved,” Taylor said. “There is a continual decline that will happen for works of art that are not properly pH balanced from a conservator, not properly cleaned.”

Many of the high-priority works are too fragile to be displayed openly. A piece by Alexander Calder is at risk of losing the artist’s signature. Taylor points to a 1637 Rembrandt etching, “Young Man in a Velvet Cap,” whose image is interrupted by adhesive bleeding through from the back of the piece. It severely distracts from appreciation of what made Rembrandt so great: his lines.

“I want observers to see the image as close to pristine as possible,” Taylor said. “So they can really study what the artist did rather than what somebody that came after Rembrandt did.”

Budgetary constraints make it impossible to perform the intensive conservation these pieces require, Taylor said.

About a year ago, Jim, ’71, and Santha, ’84, Kerns, residents of Cedar Falls and longtime art advocates, participated in a tour of the art on campus led by Taylor. What they saw concerned them.

“Some of the sculptures that we looked at are in dire need of care,” Santha said. “That’s when we started asking Darrell questions: ‘How are you taking care of this?’”

“Darrell was pretty frank that the funds are just not there to do the work that needs to be done,” Jim said. “We just thought, ‘It would be a shame to lose these pieces.’”

From there, Jim and Santha worked with the UNI Foundation, Taylor and others to launch a sustainable source of funding for the Permanent Art Collection, laying the groundwork for the Friends group. Jim and Santha said the support was overwhelming from the start.

“I haven’t been surprised at all by the support because the need is so great,” Jim said. “I’ve been pleased.”

Jim has been making pottery for as many years as he has worked for John Deere, nearly 50. Santha taught art at Peet Middle School for nearly 20 years. Both are UNI graduates with longstanding ties to the university’s art department.

Henri Matisse, Baigneuse au collier, linoleum cut, 1869-1954 / UNI Department of Art Purchase / UNI 1961.020.

“We just thought 'IT WOULD BE A SHAME TO LOSE THESE PIECES.'

-JIM KERNs
Jim and Santha speak of art as an antidote to fruitless problem solving, the genesis of creative answers to society’s most complex problems. They say the Permanent Art Collection is a vehicle to educate our community about art.

“It’s our history,” Jim said. “The art that’s represented in these collections, and throughout the world, speaks to the history of mankind and the lessons we can learn.”

Taylor says conservation will allow more art to be displayed for the public and even shared with other galleries.

“These works need to be conserved because it’s important for the legacy of this collection,” Taylor said. “So that not only students from academic year 2017-18 can appreciate and learn from a work of art, but students and scholars from 2047-48 can as well.”
“You look like a werewolf.”

When Dominique Jefferson first returned home, that was the first thing his cousin said to him. Having spent two months in a hospital in Chicago and nearly two weeks in a hospital in Iowa City, Dominique’s hair and facial hair had been neglected for far too long.

His cousin insisted he needed a haircut, and Dominique obliged that very same day.

It was a small but significant return to normalcy for the University of Northern Iowa student whose life had been turned upside down on April 20, 2016.

That night, while performing as part of the probate announcing his membership to the fraternity Omega Psi Phi for those outside the fraternity, Dominique missed a step in the routine that he had spent countless hours and countless days practicing.

Dominique knew something wasn’t right. Not long after the performance, he began to feel a sharp pain in his back. In about 10 or 15 minutes, the pain had become unbearable. He left the Maucker Union ballroom to get a drink of water and collapsed. Dominique pulled himself up and was able to take three steps towards a couch before having to crawl the rest of the way.

As he lay there on the couch, he realized he couldn’t move anything below the neck.

His fraternity brothers ended up driving him to the hospital, where an MRI revealed a blood clot on his spinal cord. The official diagnosis was a spontaneous thoracic hematoma. The doctors conducted numerous tests, but were unable to determine the cause.

Dominique had even been to a doctor twice before in the weeks leading up to that night, once for a physical required as part of his membership to the fraternity and once a few weeks later after experiencing some hip pain. He received a clean bill of health after both visits.
I can’t say it was easy, because I’d be lying. But you’ve got to take what life gives you and just keep going. It could’ve been worse.”

-Dominique Jefferson
I couldn’t accept what had happened to me as my fate for the rest of my life.”
As a 21-year-old college student finishing out his junior year, Dominique admitted that it felt like someone had come in and, "hit a light switch and cut everything off."

"I can’t say it was easy, because I’d be lying," Dominique said. "But you’ve got to take what life gives you and just keep going. It could’ve been worse."

Much worse.

After surgery, Dominique suffered a scare—unknowingly to him at the time—when the doctors sat him up on the edge of the bed and he began to experience a massive headache. As his blood pressure began to drop to dangerously low levels, the doctors scrambled for answers, privately informing his mother that his condition was life-threatening. Fortunately, he stabilized.

But the doctors did not think Dominique would ever walk again, although they refrained from sharing that belief with him early on, for fear of the damage it would do to his psyche. Dominique had a different mindset.

Once physical therapy began, Dominique set out to push the limits of what he could do. When he first started to regain leg movement, his physical therapists expressed their disbelief.

"I was like, ‘I don’t know what you thought, but I knew I was going to walk again,’” he recalled.

After nine months of physical therapy, Dominique was able to return to UNI. He can walk again, aided by a pair of leg braces that help with balance and strength, but has opted to use a wheelchair to get around campus because his pace isn’t quite where it needs to be.

Wheelchair or not, his outlook on his situation couldn’t be brighter.

"I’m breathing. I’m talking. I’m seeing right now, I’m feeling things. Eighteen months ago, all of that could’ve been cut out. Period. I could’ve been done," Dominique said. “Even when I’m rolling around in a wheelchair, I’m smiling, because I could not be here. So how could I not be grateful for my current situation, even if I’m in a wheelchair?"

In addition to physical therapy and an impenetrable positive attitude, Dominique also credits the support system of friends and family for helping him get to where he is today.

One moment, in particular, that stands out to him was when his father brought him back to UNI. Dominique was nervous about the prospect of returning to school, uncertain of whether he could succeed. Before he left, his father—whom Dominique has described as "reserved" and not someone who shows a lot of emotion—said to him: "I’m proud of you."

"I felt the emotion in his voice," Dominique said. After that, "I didn’t know if I could do it, but I had to do it. It’s not about me. If I don’t, I’m letting him down. My mom, my grandma, everyone."

Even though he marvels at the progress he has made so far and how he has managed to defy the odds, for him there is still more work to be done.

"Every day," Dominique said, when asked how often he thinks about the day when he’ll fully regain all of the physical capabilities he once had.

"I think about that a lot, and maybe too much, to be honest, because there is no guarantee that I’ll ever get back to that point, I believe it’s going to happen. I want it to happen. I’m going to do everything I can for that to happen."

"At the same time, I have to live in reality, too. I wasn’t supposed to walk again. At the stage I’m at right now, if I were to stay like this the rest of my life, how could I be upset with that? But at the same time, I wasn’t supposed to walk again."

"Yet I’m walking,” he said, smiling.
"Law and order" at the local, state and federal levels has been the topic of much debate across America in recent years, with no shortage of opinions on our country’s criminal justice system.

At the University of Northern Iowa, interest in criminology and criminal justice has continued to grow over the last 36 years, culminating in the offering of a new criminal justice program.

Gayle Rhineberger-Dunn, a professor of criminology, explained that the need for a criminal justice program was brought to their attention when a survey of graduating seniors from the criminology program revealed the desire for more applied criminal justice classes.

Matthew Makarios, associate professor of criminology, believes the new criminal justice program will only enhance the education opportunities being offered at UNI.

“Our programs can serve a variety of students, from the traditional student coming to campus right out of high school to the working professional that needs to take online classes because they live on the other side of the state,” Makarios said. “This means that we can now reach more students and make education more accessible than before.”
DIGITAL MEDIA

Few mediums have experienced as much change over the last decade as the field of digital media. As the field has continued to evolve both nationally and globally, UNI has evolved right along with it, leading to the introduction of a new digital media program last spring.

The new program consists of three majors: digital journalism, digital media leadership and digital media production.

“The industry has seen new developments and directions in the mix between artistic storytelling, exciting new digital technologies and multi-platform business models,” said Paul Torre, who is in his fifth year at UNI as an assistant professor of communication studies. “We also have tracked changes in academic programs across the country, and were eager for our program to match or exceed media programs in Iowa and the region.”

Torre believes that the media production program at UNI is one of the strongest in the state and that these changes will only serve to enhance it.

“The new digital media program combines creativity and innovation in digital media storytelling and leadership, preparing graduates for careers in an exciting and expanding field,” said Torre.

ENTREPRENEURSHIP

For a lot of people, nothing embodies the American Dream quite like the entrepreneur. That person who builds something out of nothing, launching and running their own business.

UNI is doing its part to encourage more students to chase that dream, with the introduction of a new entrepreneurship minor. The minor represents a collaborative effort between the UNI Department of Marketing and the UNI John Pappajohn Entrepreneurial center (JPEC).

“The minor was created to teach students how to start businesses or become entrepreneurs within an organization,” explained Katerine Cota, associate director of the JPEC.

The new minor will look to build upon the existing certificate in the entrepreneurship program with additional coursework in marketing and the student’s chosen area of study. In that area of study, the student will create an original business plan as well as engage in experiential learning through a major project for a real client company.
Brent Dahlstrom, ’07, started by mowing lawns in high school and selling tickets out of his college dorm room when he was a freshman finance and real estate double major at UNI. Today, he owns and develops more than 1,000 properties.
“I don’t think I ever thought I’d be where I am today,” said Dahlstrom when asked if this is what he envisioned for his career when he was attending UNI.

As an undergraduate, he assumed he would end up working at Principal or Wells Fargo after graduation. This was before the housing market crash that would affect a vast number of his classmates. When he opted to strike out on his own, rejecting the more traditional career path that was perceived to be “safer” at the time, there was no shortage of doubters.

“Never let someone tell you you can’t do it. I was told by so many people for a very, very long time that what I was doing was not smart, too risky, that I would regret it. I never listened to those people.”

In addition to his real estate developments, Dahlstrom is also involved in a number of other business ventures—including Dolly’s Tickets, Dolly’s Party Bus and Dolly’s Taxi—but has ceded control of the day-to-day operations to his business partner.

His focus remains squarely on real estate, including Panther Builders, a custom home building service based in the Cedar Valley. Started five years ago with the initial goal of building a few houses each year, Panther Builders now builds close to a hundred homes each year.

When talking about the keys to his success, Dahlstrom is quick to credit the team of people he has surrounded himself with, many of whom are UNI graduates.

“I partner on almost every one of my projects with friends and people that I’ve met along the way,” Dahlstrom said. “It makes it more enjoyable to do it together than all by myself. I want to continue to make long lasting relationships.”

He also stresses that patience is one of the most important qualities for a budding entrepreneur, having personally endured tough times with each of his own business ventures.

“If you look at all businesses, whether it’s Google or Apple or Facebook, and look at the beginnings, no one ever started and just exploded. Most of them go through financial hardships. It takes time and effort, and it takes [from] people their guts and their blood.”

On a chilly fall morning, Marin Parsons walked up to the Communication Arts Complex at UNI and marched inside, her strawberry-blonde ponytail bouncing with each step. She was greeted by a trio of students gathered just inside the door but paused only long enough to wave before continuing on her mission to the elevator that will take her to the second floor. She stood on her tiptoes to press the call button and stepped inside the elevator.

When the doors opened on the second floor, Marin stepped out into the lobby of the Roy Eblen Speech and Hearing Clinic. There Marin was greeted by Lisa Daringer, ’16, and escorted down the hall to a small room full of toys and activities. The pair will spend the better part of the next hour engaged in play.

At three years old, Marin’s speech is a handful of spoken words along with several signs. She has come to the Roy Eblen Speech and Hearing Clinic twice a week for speech therapy services for the last year and a half. Marin doesn’t realize the play she looks forward to each week is structured to help develop her speech.

Lisa is a graduate student pursuing a master’s degree in speech pathology and Marin’s speech clinician for the semester. Inside the therapy room Marin stands, shaking a green bottle of bubbles.

“Marin, what do you want?” asks Lisa, signing words as she says them. Her goal is to have Marin identify and communicate what activity she would like to do next.

“Want bubbles?” asks Lisa again, stressing each word as she signs them.

Marin signs, “Want bubbles,” and smiles. “Open the bubbles,” Lisa narrates. “Let’s blow bubbles. Are you ready? Here we go!” Marin hovers in front of Lisa, who is sitting on the floor holding the bottle of bubbles. Occasionally Marin manages to blow a bubble on her own, though not today. Today she is just as interested in the bottle and bubble wand as she is the bubbles. "Shut the bubbles. Open the bubbles. In goes the stick," Lisa continues to narrate, following Marin’s lead.

The game continues until Marin signs, "All done."

Sitting on the other side of a two-way mirror watching the encounter is Marin’s mom, Sarah Parsons, MA ’05. She and her husband, Todd, sought out speech therapy for their youngest daughter, knowing that communication was a struggle.

"Communication is key to life. It’s your connection to other people and helps you navigate the world," said Sarah. "Todd and I understand Marin better than others do, but what happens when she goes off to school? What if she needs something from a teacher or wants to share her thoughts with a friend?"

It was these worries that drove the parents to contact the Roy Eblen Speech and Hearing Clinic for help.

"We are a little different than most outpatient clinics," said Suzanne Dripps, BA ’04, MA ’06, director of the Roy Eblen Speech and Hearing Clinic. "We are student based. You don’t have to have a doctor’s referral to come here. We do have doctors refer patients here, but a parent or spouse could call and say, ‘I have some concerns with my loved one,’ and they could come and be evaluated."

This difference made it easy for the Parsons to get Marin evaluated for speech services.

The Roy Eblen Speech and Hearing Clinic serves clients who range in age from 16 months old through adulthood.

For Molly Thuente, ’16, and in her second year of the graduate program, the variety of clients has proved beneficial in helping her know what type of work she’d like to do once she’s completed her degree.

"I’ve always thought I really wanted to work with kids, but I’ve actually really enjoyed working with the adults I’ve had this semester. I was always nervous working with the adult population because I didn’t have a lot of experience working with adults that have either some sort of communication need or disability. But working with our supervisors and getting the opportunity to work in those areas makes me a lot more confident."

Students pursuing a master’s in speech therapy are required to complete 400 clinical hours before they graduate. Undergraduate students in their last semester also have the opportunity to serve the clinic.

In addition to clients of various ages, student clinicians get experience in different areas of speech therapy—from expressive language or using a communication device to working on fluency or swallowing. Clients may have a speech sound issue, an intellectual disability, a traumatic brain injury, have suffered a stroke or have some other form of acquired aphasia.

Dripps also places students out in the community, helping speech language pathologists in the schools or clinic directors in hospitals or skilled nursing facilities. Many of the graduate students go on to work professionally in the state of Iowa.

For the Parsons family and many others in the Cedar Valley, the Roy Eblen Speech and Hearing Clinic offers much-needed services.

“We’ve been thankful to have had three outstanding speech language pathology students who have worked with Marin,” said Sarah. “Watching Marin’s language skills blossom has been a joy and a relief. It reaffirmed our decision to bring her to the clinic. Every student we’ve encountered has been a complete professional.”

"Communication is key to life. It’s your connection to other people and helps you navigate the world."

#LIVEPURPLEGIVEGOLD

#LivePurpleGiveGold for the 2018 UNI Day of Giving

Join the Panther Nation Wednesday, April 4 for the Day of Giving. These 24 hours are an opportunity to share why you live purple and make an impact by giving gold! More information will be available at dayofgiving.uni.edu.

‘Nothing Compares’ to UNI at the Iowa State Fair

UNI will host an interactive exhibit at the Iowa State Fair from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m., Thursday, Aug. 9, through Sunday, Aug. 19, in the Varied Industries Building. UNI Bookstore will sell UNI clothing, Panther gear and memorabilia. Join us at the fair!

RaiseMe

Do you know a current high school student? Let them know they can begin earning scholarships at UNI throughout their high school career by following UNI on RaiseMe. RaiseMe is an online platform and app that allows students to earn scholarship dollars based on achievements throughout high school, such as getting good grades and being involved. Dollars can be awarded as scholarships throughout a student’s academic career at UNI. Students can follow UNI and start earning today!
