Reflections from ‘Three Boys from the B-School’

Former UNIBusiness Dean Robert James Waller and two of his students reflect on life lessons learned in and out of the classroom.

UNI Department of Economics: A Launch Pad for Careers in Law

It’s not uncommon for economics students to head to law school after graduation. Find out why their UNIBusiness education serves them well on this path.

In Memory of Christine Bauman

UNIBusiness lost an influential member of its faculty in April 2012.

On the Cover

As the founding dean of UNIBusiness, Robert James Waller influenced many students in and out of the classroom. In an essay beginning on page 4, he reflects on his own path and the paths taken by two former students.
In our cover story, Joe Dunsmore (Management ’80) and Troy Henkels (Management ’89) share memories that capture the influence former UNIBusiness dean and professor Robert James Waller (Marketing ’62, MA ’64) had, and continues to have, on them. But our cover story also reveals a point not as routinely noted: professors learn profound life lessons from their students, too. Wisdom does not travel a one-way street.

I was thinking about this point when I recently met with retired colleague Darrell Davis (Accounting ’65, MA ’69). As if to validate the idea, he recalled many wonderful interactions with students at UNIBusiness. He is one of the most admired professors to have ever taught here, but listening to him, I got the sense that he thought he was the privileged party.

However busy they might be, professors welcome interactions with students. Office visits to discuss a paper or an upcoming test may evolve into an examination of career plans for the student while providing insight into a young person’s unique perspective for the professor. From those important conversations to chance encounters on the Hill to wedding invitations to the subsequent sharing of a new baby’s picture, professors are now and then invited into students’ lives. They draw confidence and fulfillment from such experiences.

Meaningful interactions also prompt faculty to examine their own philosophy and style. The outcome is better teachers and wiser people.

Consider every fondly remembered exchange during your time at UNIBusiness, and you can safely assume it was equally telling to your professor. If your time with us included meaningful engagements with our faculty, you should be pleased to know that you contributed to both the collective wisdom that resides in UNIBusiness and the personal growth of our professors.

But it doesn’t have to end there. Waller kept in touch with Henkels and reconnected with Dunsmore years later. Davis is known to drop in on his former students. Those relationships evolve over time, students become intellectual peers, and both sides learn and grow.

I’ve enjoyed similar experiences. I recently reconnected with Patrick Hellman (Management ’87), my former student. This renewal broadened my professional perspective: I learned a thing or two about the latest in his line of business while I worked on a promising new partnership between Wells Fargo and UNIBusiness, which is described on page 27 of this issue. I’m sure Hellman will agree that our work together would not have jelled so nicely had it not been for the special student-teacher bond forged all those years ago.

Classes end, final grades come in and students move on, most likely never imagining the influence they’ve had on their professors. But now that you know, why not try to restore your relationship with a favorite professor? He or she will appreciate that you reached out, you will revisit fond moments from the past, and you just may start another chapter in a mutually satisfying relationship.

ROBERT JAMES WALLER is the founding dean of the University of Northern Iowa College of Business Administration and a best-selling author. He graduated from UNI with a Bachelor of Arts in business education-marketing in 1962 and a Master of Arts in marketing in 1964. He taught in UNI’s College of Business Administration for more than 20 years, serving six of those years as dean. He has lectured and published widely in the fields of problem solving and decision making, and has worked as a consultant around the world.
Waller now lives on a ranch in Texas where he writes, takes photographs and plays multiple instruments.
THREE BOYS FROM THE B-SCHOOL

Joe Dunsmore (Management ’80) was lecturing to an audience of one. He had charts and graphs and diagrams, and he had passion. I listened, I listened carefully, asking questions, since this was complex, important stuff Joe was talking about as he laid out the hopes, dreams, plans, innovations and uncertainties of concern to the CEO of a major technology corporation. But while I listened, I could not help thinking of a classroom on the west side of Seerley Hall, at the University of Northern Iowa, 30 years before. Radiators clanking, snow blowing against the windows, I was lecturing and Joe was listening. So all those decades later, it was poignant, the old professor concentrating on an articulate presentation by one of his former students.

Sometimes the students and I visited the UNI art gallery to talk about the similarities between good managers and good artists, the decisions they make. Other times, Troy recalls, we stood under the trees on campus, discussing the extinction of the dusky sparrow and the human decisions that contributed to its demise. Joe remembers when I brought my five-string banjo to class and discussed the well-rounded, integrated life and the decisions required to obtain that life.

The three of us — Joe, Troy and I — are connected in a way that only chance and a good university allow. In the 1950s, when I was an undergraduate, Seerley Hall was the university library, and I walked those corridors and perused the book stacks, later on teaching economics in what formerly was the great reading room of the library. Eventually the three of us journeyed through 15:163, a course that, for me, had a life of its own, a growing, changing organism of discovery, with the idea of decision making binding us as we moved through the course and through our lives.

We are all graduates of the UNI business program, all slightly eccentric adventurers in our own fashion, chasing the endless frontiers of the small universes we choose to inhabit. Joe and Troy share something else, something quite rare: they both received A grades in my course, scores not easily won. At the conclusion of Joe’s final class period, as I thanked the students for their hard work and kind attention, they (continued on page 8)

While Joe was battling his way through the storms of a shifting economy, Troy was struggling up the slopes of Everest.

On the north side of Seerley Hall, another classroom, another lecture some 10 years after Joe graduated. This time Troy Henkels (Management ’89) was listening as I walked around, tossing a piece of chalk in my right hand, spring just outside the windows, Troy’s last semester in college. Same course as Joe took, 15:163 Management Decision Making, a course I established in the early 1970s.

While Joe was battling his way through the storms of a shifting economy and the long climb to CEO, Troy was struggling up the slopes of Everest and attempting to work his way across the hostile Bering Strait on floe ice, with the intent of reaching Russia. Troy still recalls a comment I made one day in class: “I always remember you saying that life is a race between death and discovery, and that has always stayed with me.”

During a recent visit, Dr. Robert Waller related a favorite quote that he originally used in the novel Border Music: “We come, we do, we go.” Management Decision Making was a course on “do.” It was as much a course on life as it was decision making. The synthesis was seamless for Dr. Waller because “do” is about choices, decisions and consequences.

Memories fade, but there are aspects from that experience over 30 years ago that speak with the clarity of experience and reflection.

One day 33 years ago, I knocked on the door to Dr. Waller’s office to make a request. He waved me in, and I walked into the long and narrow, book-infested domain to eventually reach his desk. A bit nervous, I sat in the chair in front of his desk. He looked up, eyes above reading glasses, and said in a long, low-pitched, questioning tone, “Yes?”

After that, the conversation went something like this:

Joe: Dr. Waller, you said in class today that all tests would be unannounced. I play on the UNI baseball team, and we are taking a spring trip to Texas for a week right in the middle of the quarter. So, I assume that I could make up a test if it is given that week. Right?

Dr. Waller: Wrong.

Joe: But Dr. Waller, that’s not fair.

Dr. Waller: Life isn’t about fairness.

Joe: But I am representing the University on the baseball team. I should get some kind of special treatment, shouldn’t I? (This was the wrong argument to make.)

Dr. Waller: Mr. Dunsmore, I don’t really care that you play on the baseball team. What I care about is that you learn what I want you to learn in my class. Life and business are about choices, decisions and consequences. I am sure that you will make the right decision.

Another day, he walked into class playing his banjo, singing and interspersing thoughts on a balanced life. That day he told us that he plays several musical instruments, would write a book and eventually live on a ranch. To be frank, it sounded a bit quixotic to a college junior at the time, but he sure seemed resolute and passionate about these things.

Most importantly, Dr. Waller introduced the concept he called “the value of the small increment.” In whatever you decide to do, if you are willing to work a small fraction harder and smarter than your counterparts every single day, the compound value of the advantage that you can create over time will be significant. He equated the analogy to compound interest but with daily compounding. This powerful concept became a foundational principle for me as I entered the business world. I knew there were people who were smarter than me, but fundamentally believed that my daily passion and focus would be the differentiator over time.

So, what did I learn in that class? Life is about choices, decisions and consequences. Find things you can be passionate about. And most importantly, “do.” And when you “do,” apply the value of small increment daily.

I guess he wasn’t so quixotic, was he?

Memories fade but the inspiration grows.
THREE BOYS FROM THE B-SCHOOL

spontaneously came to their feet in a standing ovation — that happened only once in my teaching career, but once was enough. Joe began with John Deere, then joined a division of AT&T, went on to a position with Lucent Microelectronics, and eventually became chairman and CEO of Digi International, a NASDAQ company, where he led a turnaround of the firm and repositioned it as a leader in commercial-grade electronic networking. He has taken Digi from a market capitalization of $28 million in 2002 to $280 million in 2012.

Joe, Troy,

Iowa boys — we grow up in the small towns and countryside. We wonder what’s out there, what the possibilities might be. Joe played baseball at UNI, I played basketball, Troy climbs mountains and traverses ice, as we all do, the metaphor being too obvious. The two of them majored in management and learned that self-management is the trickiest job of all. I learned that, too, and tried to pass on a bit of whatever wisdom I had acquired, emphasizing that decision making extends far beyond relatively mundane business problems.

in a recent book. Joe credits that idea with some of his success. Troy speaks of the small increments that have taken him to his dreams and how his business training at UNI has been critical to planning and executing large, complex expeditions.

FOR TROY, A DIFFERENT PATH.

After graduating from UNI, he joined Hyatt Hotels as a management trainee and quickly ascended to a position of importance. But the race between death and discovery haunted him, and he began a long series of adventures and learning, from locksmith early on to communications tech at McMurdo Station in Antarctica. Mountain climber, trekker, cinematographer, journalist, marathoner, North Pole guide and author of a forthcoming book. Home in Alaska part of the year, the world the rest of the time.

And what do they remember from 15:163? Not so much the matrices and structural modeling and probability theory — technical material slips away unless it is constantly reinforced — but rather the more elusive things into which decision making leads us. Joe remembers the class as “a course in life.” Before leaving the campus, Troy gave me a small book containing the nearly offhand comments I sometimes made: “If you can’t count it, it’s probably important,” and so forth. Joe remembers clearly my emphasis on what I had labeled “the value of the small increment,” a topic to which I devoted an entire chapter.

TODAY, AS I OPEN MY violin case to work on a swingy version of “Autumn Leaves,” I imagine Joe walking through his manufacturing plant and thinking about the future of his firm, while Troy studies maps and readies himself for the polar ice again. Each of us chasing our own frontiers, humbled still by all there is to know in our small universes, making decisions moment by moment — Iowa boys from the University of Northern Iowa business school, doing the best we can in small increments, running the eternal race between death and discovery. I think we are winning, or close to it, and, in truth, I find myself cheering the accomplishments of my former students with far more enthusiasm than I do my own. To all of those students, the diligent ones who struggled with subtle, difficult ideas, I give you my own standing ovation.
MY TIME WITH
Dr. Robert Waller came in 1989, my last semester at UNI. I enrolled in Management Decision Making, and that course changed the course of my life.

The first few classes were a bit startling because of the high standards he set. It was clear that to do well you had to pay attention, think on your feet, apply yourself and think outside the box. Most of all you had to be willing to dedicate time and effort into the material. Dr. Waller put a lot into the class and expected a lot from his students.

For me it wasn’t so much the Decision Making material that was life changing; it was that Dr. Waller made it seem okay to want to care about the environment, be passionate about life, watch sunsets, chase dreams, think differently, go against what society told you was the right way to progress through life. At 22 years old, you think there is all the time in the world, but Dr. Waller made me realize it would pass by quickly. You had to really get out and live life and chase down your dreams. I believed it and didn’t want to waste any time getting started.

Through Dr. Waller’s class I learned how to actually take a business concept and apply it to the real world. Until then I had only learned how to take business concepts and apply them to the business world. This has served me well, as what I do now is take decision-making concepts and apply them to expeditions.

I left UNI with the tools I needed to map out a path through life. Not a conventional one, but a very rewarding and successful life on many levels. I’ve been fortunate for the experiences I’ve had. Without Dr. Waller’s influence and without my business degree, these adventures never would have happened.

Reflections from Troy Henkels

A course with Robert James Waller changed the course of Troy Henkels’ life.
It is almost unpatriotic to suggest that utilities in West Virginia consider reducing their dependence on coal to generate electricity.

As compared to my work in the Pacific Northwest and in New York, policymakers in this region are not as receptive to many elements of a clean energy agenda, and the fossil fuel-based energy industry is accustomed to getting its way in shaping the state's energy policies. References to “climate change” and “global warming” must be uttered sparingly and with caution.

The WVU Center for Energy and Sustainable Development must strike a balance between developing the state’s energy resources (and reaping their economic benefits) and reducing the environmental impacts of doing so. But the issues are controversial and contentious.

In the case of coal-fired generation, the coal industry would have the public believe that it is the “job-killing Environmental Protection Agency” that is responsible for the shuttering of dozens of coal plants nationwide, through the agency's new mercury rules and regulation of greenhouse gases. Billboards throughout the state proclaim West Virginia as part of the “EPA's No Job Zone.” Yet the truth is that many of the smaller, older and less-efficient coal-fired plants are closing due to simple economics, not politics: they are no longer economical as compared to low-emission, cheaper natural gas plants.

West Virginia is well-positioned to play a significant role in the transition to a cleaner energy supply with the abundance of natural gas offered by the Marcellus Shale under a vast portion of the state. Yet development of these natural gas reserves triggers deep emotions. There are perceived environmental risks in shale gas development: the tremendous demands upon water supplies and skepticism about whether the economic benefits will be realized by West Virginians rather than by Texas- and Oklahoma-based companies. In addition, it is common in West Virginia to have the mineral rights — the right to extract the gas and minerals beneath the surface — severed from the surface rights, or the

JAMIE VAN NOSTRAND (ECONOMICS ’76) LEFT IOWA IN 1979 AFTER GETTING HIS LAW DEGREE. Since then, his career path has taken a number of turns. He worked for the New York Public Service Commission, spent 22 years in a successful private law practice serving the Pacific Northwest energy industry and was a visiting professor on energy law and executive director of the Pace University Energy and Climate Center. He also earned an LL.M. degree in Environmental Law from Pace in May 2011.

Today Van Nostrand is the director of the Center for Energy and Sustainable Development at West Virginia University (WVU) College of Law. In this position he combines his interest in energy and environmental issues with a desire to teach. He continues a path his father — the late Maurice Van Nostrand, who served as state legislator and was involved in Iowa energy regulation — started before him.

On the following pages, Van Nostrand describes the challenges of balancing a clean energy agenda with a historical economic dependence on the extraction of fossil fuels. And you’ll discover why his background makes him the perfect person to teach those who’ll be shaping tomorrow’s energy policies.
ownership of the fields, forests and pastures on the surface. Because the mineral rights holder has rights to "reasonable access" to the gas and minerals below, a shale gas developer can erect a 5- to 10-acre drilling well pad (including an impoundment pond capable of holding millions of gallons of water) within a few hundred feet of a residential dwelling, with the surface owner having little, if any, recourse. This anomaly of West Virginia property law in and of itself creates deep conflict between the stakeholders, and creates a significant challenge for the center I lead to even convene a forum for discussion, much less offer a balanced perspective that will satisfy the "fairness" demands of the various stakeholders.

My background as an energy industry lawyer, government regulator and director of an environmental non-governmental organization gives me a unique skill set to advance the debate toward solutions that strike a reasonable balance. Having represented clients in the energy industry for over two decades, and having the experience of wearing the "green" environmental hat for a few years in energy proceedings, I benefit from a unique perspective on the issues and insights to the competing objectives. I try to share these insights and perspectives with my students, as the benefits of my experience should inform their training and thereby produce better lawyers to shape the energy and environmental policies in the next generation.

Given the convergence of energy and environmental issues in the debate about climate change and the impacts of energy production, it's an exciting time to be involved in the energy industry. Whether the debate concerns the construction of the Keystone XL pipeline, the wisdom of federal loan guarantees to solar companies, the continuation of production tax credits for wind farms or the causes of an undeniably warming planet, energy and environmental issues dominate the news and the political agenda. The long-term prospects for employment in this field are bright, as environmental regulation will likely continue to be more stringent, and the more frequent and widespread skirmishes between the "polluters" and the "regulators" will result in the growth of good-paying jobs for lawyers.

Advancing a sustainability agenda in West Virginia is just the sort of challenge I was looking for in this last phase of my law career, and I am fully embracing the opportunity. I think my father would be pleased that I have taken on this task.

NOSTRAND'S TAKE ON ENERGY AND CLIMATE CHANGE

“The connection between energy production and the greenhouse gases that contribute to climate change is indisputable. Energy-related carbon dioxide emissions, resulting primarily from coal for electricity generation, petroleum for transportation and natural gas for electricity generation and heating, represent 82 percent of total U.S. human-made greenhouse gas emissions. We cannot address climate change in the U.S. without making fundamental changes in our use of energy.” – Jamie Van Nostrand
Even in environmental law, Jamie Van Nostrand (Economics ‘76) uses his business background. “I had to be proficient in finance, economics and accounting to be successful as an energy lawyer,” he said. “Economics is no less important in the field of environmental law, with the increased emphasis on market-based solutions to environmental issues.”

The Department of Economics has a proud tradition of preparing students for successful careers in law. On average, about 10 to 15 percent of economics graduates continue to law school each year.

“Attorneys with a business background have an advantage in contracts, mergers and acquisitions, tax, estate planning, torts, environmental law and antitrust,” said Lisa Jepsen, associate professor of economics and Pre-Law Club faculty adviser. “They are used to evaluating situations from a cost-benefit perspective and are comfortable assessing what certain claims are worth.”

Research shows that, traditionally, economics majors do well on the LSAT (Law School Admissions Test), perhaps because Department of Economics courses give students a strong foundation in problem solving, analytical reasoning, statistical analysis and writing.

“The curriculum was challenging and forced me to develop research, analytical and writing skills, which are very important to my practice,” said Liz Dunshee (Economics ’03), a senior associate with Fredrikson & Byron’s Securities, Corporate, and Mergers & Acquisitions Groups.

“Having these skills at the outset of law school allowed me to focus on the substantive portion of my legal education and gave me an edge during the first year of law school. Because performance in the first year is very important to law firms that interview on campus, I believe my solid undergraduate education was largely responsible for the job I have today.”

John Fordyce (Economics and Philosophy ’08) attended Harvard Law School and is now an associate at Sidley in Chicago. He says UNI’s Department of Economics is a great place for future lawyers to start their education, and not just because of its solid curriculum.

“The economics professors at UNI are some of the most intelligent and caring educators under which I have studied,” he said. “I can’t overestimate how inspiring it is to have a knowledgeable professor in your corner when you are trying to navigate the path to law school.

“I certainly feel that a degree in economics — and especially from UNI — is one of the best paths for a prospective lawyer.”

It is so inspiring to have a knowledgable professor in your corner when you are navigating the path to law school.
Christine Bauman died on April 26, 2012. In a letter to the College, Dean Farzad Moussavi wrote:

“The colleague we lost was special. She excelled in every dimension along which academic performance is measured. She was a superb teacher, an accomplished scholar, and gave so much time and energy to her service duties both in the College and the larger professional community. And whatever endeavor she engaged in, she delivered with gusto.

“She was uncompromising when it came to our cherished values of quality and rigor. In the classroom, she demanded the best from her students, and by all accounts, they delivered. Beyond the classroom she was a relentless advocate for the professional interests of our students in the Accounting Club and the MAcc program. She raised the scholarly profile of the entire College with her scholarship. And PwC, the organization whose professorship Chris held, could not have asked for a more worthy ambassador.

“I had many encounters with Chris, and throughout I admired her tenacity and courage to do and say what she thought was right. The same qualities she had exhibited in her professional capacity here in the College came to characterize her battle with her illness. The battle was devastating, but it could not deter Chris from performing her duties until the very end.”

Bauman received a number of awards and much recognition during her years with UNIBusiness, including:

• The inaugural UNIBusiness PricewaterhouseCoopers Professor of Accounting in recognition of her outstanding scholarship, teaching and service to the profession.

• 2008 Veridian Community Engagement Award for directing the UNI Volunteer Income Tax Assistance (VITA) program, an outreach effort in which undergraduate accounting students help low-income individuals and families with their tax returns.

• 2009 Faculty Teaching Award

• 2010 and 2012 Faculty Service Awards

As a faculty member and an adviser to the UNI Accounting Club, the College’s largest student organization, Bauman had a direct influence on hundreds of students over the years. She is greatly missed.
UNIBusiness celebrates excellence in student competitions, program milestones, and faculty and staff accomplishments throughout the year, and there is much to celebrate. The following is just a small sample from the hundreds of success stories posted at business.uni.edu each year.

UNI Defeats ISU, UI and Drake to Win Krause Challenge

UNIBusiness finance students came out on top of this year’s Krause Challenge, defeating Drake University, Iowa State University and the University of Iowa in the annual investment competition.

The Krause Challenge began in 1998 when W.A. Krause, founder and chairman of Kum & Go, presented a one-time gift of $400,000, to be divided equally among Drake, ISU, UI and UNI to create a program for finance students to enhance their knowledge of and experience with the stock market fluctuations and portfolio management. Each school competes to deliver the highest return on its portfolio and for the title of Krause Challenge winner.

AAF: Educator of the Year, Best Female Presenter

After only one semester of preparation, UNI’s American Advertising Federation, under the direction of faculty adviser Matthew Wilson, finished third at the District 9 National Student Advertising Competition, where Wilson was recognized as the Educator of the Year. Jamie Harthoorn (Marketing ’12), a member of the AAF-UNI team, received the Best Female Presenter award.

“I was told by other faculty advisers and AAF coordinators it was almost unheard of for a school to place in NSAC, win so many awards, and have so many active members in their first year as a chapter.”
- Matthew Wilson

Enabling Innovation: 25 Years of Service to Iowa

The Institute for Decision Making (IDM) and the Iowa Waste Reduction Center (IWRC), both programs of UNI’s Business and Community Services, celebrate 25 years of service to the state. IDM has provided applied research and economic development training to more than 680 community and economic development organizations since its inception. The IWRC helps small businesses and government entities meet environmental regulations and implement efficient waste reduction procedures. Recently it co-won a Federal Laboratory Consortium’s Excellence in Technology Transfer regional award for its work in upgrading the VirtualPaint software.

Visit www.bcs.uni.edu/idm and www.iwrc.org for more information.

The IWRC works with the Iowa Waste Exchange in the six primary service areas designated above. The program has saved Iowans $76 million by diverting this waste into production and use.
Mitra wins 2012 Award of Excellence

Professor of management Atul Mitra’s article “A Comparative Examination of Traditional and Skill-based Pay Plans,” published in Journal of Managerial Psychology, was selected as a Highly Commended Award Winner at the Literati Network Awards for Excellence 2012. Mitra’s paper was recognized as “one of the most impressive pieces of work … throughout 2011.” Last year this same paper was recognized by human resource practitioners as one of the most recognized works in the field.

Clayson Recognized as Decade’s Top Scholar

A review of marketing education literature from 2000-2009 puts University of Northern Iowa professor of marketing Dennis Clayson at the top. He is the no. 1 author of the decade for the Journal of Marketing Education.

AQB approval puts UNI Real Estate Program Grads Far Ahead in Appraisal Certification

Graduates of the UNI Real Estate Program, retroactive to the 2004-2005 academic year, are now approved to have satisfied 90 percent of the credit hours toward the Real Property Appraiser Qualification Criteria for the Certified General Appraiser licensing. The UNI program is only the third program in the United States to receive this level of approval from the Appraiser Qualifications Board.

Top Accounting Students Take 2nd in 2011 Deloitte FanTAXtic Case Competition

A team of UNI accounting students earned second place in the 2011 regional Deloitte FanTAXtic Case Competition.

UNIBusiness Students in Southwest Advantage Top 10

UNI finished no. 6 out of more than 300 colleges and universities around the world in the 2011 Southwestern Advantage Top Campus list, thanks to the hard work of 21 UNI students who spent their summer selling educational products to families across the country. Southwestern Advantage donated $1,000 to the UNI Career Center to acknowledge the top-10 ranking.

UNI-SHRM Receives State, National Recognition

A successful turn-around of UNI’s chapter of the Society for Human Resource Management (SHRM) prompted the state and local SHRM chapters to invite last year’s UNI-SHRM President Jessica Gofforth (Management ’12) to present on behalf of the student organization. The organization was also recognized in the organization’s national Student Focus magazine.
More than 90 percent of UNIBusiness students are from Iowa and come to us with no or little international exposure. Yet we aim to graduate globally well-versed professionals who can immediately contribute to and thrive in today’s global business environment.

UNIBusiness First Wednesday Lunch
by Mary Connerley, Department of Management Head and International Task Force Chair

We are always looking for ways to encourage more interaction between domestic and international students and to provide a culture where international students thrive. To provide a setting where domestic and international students can comfortably interact, a free lunch is offered to all students on the first Wednesday of each month (three per semester). Students are assigned seats when they sign in to encourage interaction with their peers from other countries. Cards with “conversation starters” lie on each table to help should the conversation lag.

Feedback from spring 2012 suggested that some very good conversations took place over the semester. Cultural differences were acknowledged, while other conversations revealed great similarities across cultures.

Where UNIBusiness Students Call Home

UNIBusiness encourages students to study abroad, but international exposure happens at home, too. During the 2012-2013 academic year UNIBusiness students represent 25 different countries, and the International Club of Business Students holds events each semester so U.S. students can learn more about the homes of their international peers.

UNIBusiness thanks the following leading supporters of study abroad programs and international experiences for students: AEGON/Transamerica; Steven and Sandra Dickinson; Gene and Mary Anne Dietz; the late Lawrence Jepson; Bill and Charlotte Kimball; and Mike and Jacqueline Mrosko.
Running a first-world business in a developing country is very difficult, according to Frank Daniel. Daniel is the founder of The Kraal Gallery, a cause-driven organization that trains, employs and empowers women in South Africa to become master weavers and fiber artists. Waiting weeks for phone-line installation and dealing with a 15-year land-ownership dispute were just a couple of the problems Daniel shared with the 14 UNI Business students who spent two weeks in South Africa for an Organizational Management course.

In addition to visiting The Kraal Gallery, the students attended training sessions at Sanlam, a top-performing national insurance company, and worked at the Mama Lumka Project, a community-based residential and day care organization for HIV positive and abused children and AIDS orphans.

The study-abroad course gave the students a contextualized learning opportunity with a view of management in a country that has recently set out to address unemployment, inequality and poverty, said Department of Management Head Mary Connerley. The students saw the organizations’ leaders face problems they’d never before considered.

“The Mama Lumka Project is in a township with a 65-percent unemployment rate,” Connerley said. “The orphanage has a bakery and would like to sell its bread, but there is concern that the money it makes would attract unwanted attention and ‘encourage’ robbery. How do you manage money transactions without endangering the children?”

After visiting The Mama Lumka Project, The Kraal Gallery and Sanlam, the students took part in an African drumming circle.

“African drumming is used by many companies for team building because it is seen as providing an equal playing field, everyone participates, it’s energizing and relaxing, and it helps people feel connected to one another,” Connerley said.

After drumming in a larger circle for about 30 minutes, students were divided into four teams. Each team received additional instruments and told to create music that represented one of the four seasons. Each team also had a “facilitator,” but what the students didn’t know is that each “facilitator” had a unique role: distracter, supporter, last-minute disrupter or ignorer.

“The result was what you would expect,” Connerley said. “The team with the supporter did a great job while the other teams had issues. The discussion that ensued linked this type of team process to those in the workplace and the influential role ‘facilitators' can have.”

With increasing globalization, tomorrow’s business leaders are going to need a clearer picture of the world — its business and management operations and the cultures of people they’ll be working with.

UNIBusiness encourages students to study abroad by providing long- and short-term opportunities, such as Organizational Management in South Africa, and offering scholarships and other forms of support to remove financial barriers. For more information, visit business.uni.edu/connectwiththeworld.

A Note from Director of Development Michelle Rourke

Take a look at the impressive list of alumni and friends who have made a financial commitment to UNIBusiness this year. We work hard to make sure there is a significant return on their philanthropic investment.

Donors to the Dean’s Fund for Excellence support students who work hard to meet our high standards. Their dollars provide students willing to go above and beyond the regular classroom experience with opportunities that give our grads a competitive advantage upon graduation. They support successful student entrepreneurs, professional certifications, international experiences and other professional development opportunities.

Contributors to professorships and fellowships invest in a critical piece of UNIBusiness’ infrastructure: the faculty. Professorships and fellowships provide resources for faculty to stay abreast of current trends in their fields, incorporate the most relevant topics in their classes and contribute to the body of research in their disciplines. These things are required, not only to maintain our AACSB International accreditation, but to produce graduates with the technical skills necessary to make an immediate impact when they enter the workforce.

Private support for scholarships and programs makes the educational experience at UNI accessible to students who might otherwise face serious financial barriers. Investing in the futures of Iowa students who are likely to stay in Iowa after graduation has a long-term benefit for the economic well being of the state. And if you need a few more benchmarks to reassure your investment will pay off: our Accounting majors pass the CPA exam at six times the national average; our Finance majors pass the CFA Level 1 exam at twice the international average; and UNIBusiness has produced more NASBITE Certified Global Business Professionals than any other U.S. institution.

It’s important that the value of our stock as UNIBusiness alumni remains strong. Thanks for your commitment to keep it that way. To learn more about making an impact with an investment in UNIBusiness, please contact me at 800-782-9522, 319-273-4444 or michelle.rourke@uni.edu.

Giving Back: Robert J. Waller

In the spring of 2012, UNI announced a substantial estate gift from one of its best known alumni: Robert James Waller (Marketing ’62, MA ’64).

“UNI allowed me to explore my intellectual interests and my tastes, as a student, a professor and a dean,” Waller said. “As a professor, UNI provided me room to experiment with courses and course content; and, as the first dean of the business school, to have some influence on the direction of the university. I am pleased to lend support to my alma mater and to help it grow as a first-class university.”

Waller’s gift has been directed to a distinguished professorship and multiple scholarships in economics; a UNIBusiness faculty development fund; and support for the jazz program, Honours Program and Rod Library.

UNI President Benjamin Allen said, “We are grateful to see an alumnus, former professor and dean give back to the university in such a significant way. We also appreciate the way that Dr. Waller continues to challenge all of us at UNI with his own rigorous scholarly work. His gift provides support for our students and faculty, and the example he sets inspires us to always strive for excellence in our academic programs.”

Current UNIBusiness Dean Farzad Moussavi is determined to build on the values Waller set in place as the College’s first dean.

“It is so good to know our founding dean is pleased with how the school has evolved. We have made progress by holding tight to Waller’s core values of hard work and high standards,” Moussavi said. “Had he not built such a strong foundation, it may have been impossible to resist the pervasive trend in education toward deflated expectations and inflated grades. His gift means a lot to us.”
Gifts Strengthen Opportunities for Student Entrepreneurs

UNI Student Business Incubator dedicated in honor of R. J. McElroy

The Student Business Incubator, a program within JPEC, provides office space and business development expertise to a carefully selected group of student entrepreneurs who are developing a business or already have one up and running. The facility was named the R. J. McElroy Student Business Incubator during a September 2012 ceremony in recognition of a $300,000 grant from the R. J. McElroy Trust earlier in the year. The gift allows JPEC staff to enhance the expertise, programs and operational support provided to students in the incubator.

"R. J. McElroy was one of the Cedar Valley’s most noteworthy entrepreneurs, and the trust has long funded many educational activities for area youth," said Randy Pilkington, executive director of UNI Business & Community Services and director of JPEC. "The R. J. McElroy Student Business Incubator is a great combination of entrepreneurship and education."

Pappajohn Reinforces Commitment to Entrepreneurship in Iowa

The man whose name is synonymous with entrepreneurship in Iowa has made another investment in Iowa’s economic future. John Pappajohn, who has given millions to establish centers that foster entrepreneurship across the state, has made another contribution to the John Pappajohn Entrepreneurial Center (JPEC) at the University of Northern Iowa and the other four centers that bear his name.

UNI JPEC received $1.5 million to bolster its outreach and operations and a special $10,000 gift for scholarships to entrepreneurial students who demonstrate financial need.

“We applaud the vision Mr. Pappajohn had 16 years ago when he started the entrepreneurial centers, and we appreciate his personal investment in creating a new generation of entrepreneurs,” said UNI JPEC Associate Director Katherine Kota-Uyar. “His generosity and dedication to helping students achieve their educational and entrepreneurial dreams are unmatched.”

JPEC provides a range of innovative educational programs and support services designed for student entrepreneurs. It supplies expertise in all stages of business planning and development and serves as a vehicle to bring new products and technologies to market. For more information, visit www.jpec.org.
A named faculty position helps UNIBusiness attract and retain outstanding faculty while honoring the generosity of the donor who establishes the position. But students are the ultimate beneficiary. The proceeds from donor gifts allow faculty to develop new educational opportunities and generate direct financial support for students.

Karsten named first Nationwide Mutual Insurance Company Professor at UNIBusiness

UNIBusiness thanks Nationwide Mutual Insurance Company, Wendell Crosser, Paul VanDenBosch and Bob O’Hollearn.

Jeff and Julie Hamilton/ESP International Fellowship for Supply Chain & Logistics Management

At the end of 2012, UNIBusiness received a generous gift from ESP International President and CEO Jeff Hamilton (Accounting ’80) and his wife Julie. Their initial investment of $100,000 will create an endowment to support the College’s Supply Chain Management program. The gift comes as UNIBusiness is revitalizing the program and will allow the College to attract outstanding junior faculty committed to teaching, research and service in their quest for tenure. Look for more information at business.uni.edu and in next year’s UNIBusiness Alumni Magazine.

UNIBusiness thanks Jeff and Julie Hamilton for their generous support of our Supply Chain Management program.

With two recent additions, UNIBusiness is proud to have 10 named faculty positions:

- T. Wayne Davis Chair in Entrepreneurship
- John Deere Supply Chain Management Fellowship
- Deloitte Accounting Faculty Fellowship
- Gaylon Halverson Professorship in Accounting
- Jeff & Julie Hamilton/ESP International Fellowship for Supply Chain & Logistics Management
- Lawrence Jepson Professorship in International Economics
- McGladrey Professor of Accounting
- Nationwide Mutual Insurance Company Professorship
- PricewaterhouseCoopers Professor of Accounting
- David W. Wilson Chair in Business Ethics

Nationwide Mutual Insurance Company made a strong commitment to undergraduate education when it established this professorship, which will help the College attract and retain the best faculty in a competitive market. The Nationwide Mutual Insurance Company Professor is selected by the UNIBusiness dean, in consultation with Nationwide, for a three-year term. The position may rotate among the five undergraduate business departments: accounting, economics, finance, management and marketing.

Three alumni played a critical role in making this professorship happen: Wendell Crosser (Accounting ’81), vice president of finance for Allied Insurance; Paul VanDenBosch (Marketing ’87), regional vice president for Allied Insurance; and Bob O’Hollearn (Political Science ’72), regional vice president for Allied Insurance.
Faculty Recognition

Delivering essential business knowledge and instilling traditional work values require devoted faculty willing to demand the best of themselves and of their students. UNIBusiness congratulates the following faculty for their outstanding contributions to the College and our students’ education.

Hip Hippie Businesses

Think you know all there is about the free-loving, pot-smoking, rock-and-rolling hippies of the 60s?

Think again.

Associate professor of marketing Michael Klassen spent four years researching the Haight-Ashbury Hippie Movement, and he found a community of innovators and a spirit of entrepreneurship that defies the stereotypical slacker portrayed in pop culture.

Through interviews and book and media reviews, Klassen discovered that during the 100-week period of the Haight-Ashbury Hippie Movement, 39 hippies created 38 different ideas and products using their own ingenuity and meager material resources. Over 40 years later, what they set in motion is collectively worth nearly $175 billion and employs millions in the U.S. and abroad.

Klassen’s book, Billion Dollar Hippie, takes an in-depth look at the people and the products rooted in this 58-block area of San Francisco, complete with photos and personal interviews with the people who started it all. To learn more, visit www.billiondollarhippie.com.

Diversity captures the rich differences that people bring to a community. The concept is complex, shaped by history, and changing as our understanding of the world and its people evolves. At a very practical level, we want our students to understand that just as wise investors diversify their financial portfolios, it would be wise for them to diversify their social networks.

UNIBusiness Diversity Task Force

by Mary Connerley, Department of Management Head and Diversity Task Force Chair

Embracing differences in individuals maximizes the potential of the group, which is why diversity has become so important for contemporary organizations and at business schools that prepare future business leaders. At UNIBusiness we work hard to increase diversity-related awareness, knowledge and skills of faculty, staff and students. We also seek to increase interactions among majority and underrepresented students.

Diversity Case Competition

More than 50 students took part in the first UNIBusiness Diversity Case Competition, sponsored by PricewaterhouseCoopers and Veridian Credit Union.

With $5,000 at stake, the three- to four-member student teams competing in 2012 were tasked with resolving UNI’s challenges in recruiting and retaining underrepresented students. The winning team — Philip Musson (Management), Ethan Thompson (Marketing), Megan Heemstra (Marketing) and Michelle Prieto (Management) — recommended training faculty on diversity, involving UNI students in ongoing marketing and recruitment efforts as on-campus diversity ambassadors, improving recruitment and retention methods in minority communities and a campaign to increase the attractiveness of college to minority recruits.

According to the final-round judges — Carly Williams, national campus diversity leader for PricewaterhouseCoopers; Angela Weekley, community inclusion manager at Veridian Credit Union; and Gloria Gibson, executive vice president and provost at UNI — choosing a winner was not easy. Weekley was impressed by the desire all the students showed to research ways to become more inclusive and the level of cohesiveness shown by each team.

Some students who participated in the competition commented that they had not considered the advantages and challenges of diversity prior to this event. The best outcomes were the conversations that occurred among students, who reported learning as much from their teammates as they did from their research.

A MAcc Program First

While at UNI, Miller, who is originally from Gary, Ind., was an officer in the UNI Accounting Club, involved in EXCEL, and started a charitable organization with her sisters that worked with youth in Black Hawk County. UNI’s MAcc program was approved and accredited in 2000. It emphasizes applied accounting research skills, communication skills, problem-solving capabilities, and other skills and knowledge required to be a successful professional accountant in public accounting, business and government. Program completion also satisfies Iowa’s 150-hour requirement for CPA licensure.

When Sheleita Ruth Miller (Accounting and Economics ’11, MAcc ’12) walked across the stage at the spring 2012 Commencement ceremony, she made history and was recognized by UNI President Benjamin Allen as UNI’s first African American female MAcc grad.

UNIBusiness Diversity Matters

Evie Myers, vice president of equity, diversity and global outreach at North Dakota State University, visited UNI Business and spoke to faculty and staff and to students in the Professional Readiness Program about the pain stereotypical remarks can cause. She wanted people to know that even comments that seem “positive” toward a race or culture can leave an individual in that group saying, “Ouch! That stereotype hurts.”

A UNIBusiness graduate’s competitive advantage? A unique combination of traditional work values, essential business knowledge and contemporary professional skills. Our students come to us with the traditional work values of a Midwest background. Our world-class faculty delivers the essential business knowledge. And our Professional Readiness Program equips graduates with the contemporary professional skills necessary to hit the ground running.

UNIBusiness thanks Wells Fargo Home Mortgage for its commitment to our students’ professional development.

Professional Readiness Program teams up with Wells Fargo Home Mortgage

No “Waz up?” LOL or TTYL allowed.

The Professional Readiness Program (PRP) has added Wells Fargo Home Mortgage to its growing list of corporate supporters, and this supporter will hone in on students’ professional phone and email etiquette, including appropriate greetings, voice mail messages, tone and email subject lines.

With leadership from Pat Hellman (Management ’87), senior vice president of Capital Markets Loan Operations, Wells Fargo Home Mortgage has committed to helping hundreds of UNIBusiness students put their training to practice.

This fall students in the PRP Level 1 — all first-semester freshmen with a business major — were matched with mentors from Wells Fargo Home Mortgage. Students scheduled a phone meeting via email, carried on a career-focused phone conversation, and followed up with a thank you email. These skills are increasingly important in an age where texting is the main form of teenagers’ communication.

The project is also beneficial to the Wells Fargo mentors. Many of the employees chosen to participate are in the company’s Accelerated Management Program, and this partnership provided emerging managers an opportunity to be mentors and provide feedback to a professional-in-training. More than 35 Wells Fargo employees were mentors to more than 300 students in the first semester of this project.

“This is an opportunity for Wells Fargo team members to develop important mentoring skills, which are becoming a growing part of our corporate culture,” said Hellman.

“Wells Fargo team members participating in a management rotation program should provide practical guidance to college freshmen while developing the skills for both the student and the team members. As a leader, I am also participating as a mentor and have been impressed with the effort and thought that the students are putting into this project.”

The project was organized and executed by Amy Jarnagin, leadership development manager for Wells Fargo’s Accelerated Management Program. Wells Fargo Home Mortgage has committed to continue the project — a commitment to hundreds of UNIBusiness students each year.

“Wells Fargo has a proud tradition of investing in the communities we serve,” Jarnagin said. “Through this unique project, our volunteer mentors will provide guidance and help UNI train the next generation of business leaders. After graduation, we hope many of these students will continue their relationships with us, either as our customers, suppliers, business partners or team members.”

More than 35 Wells Fargo employees were mentors to more than 300 students in the first semester of this project.

UNIBusiness thanks Wells Fargo Home Mortgage for its commitment to our students’ professional development.

PRP Seeks Corporate Partners

The UNIBusiness Professional Readiness Program is looking for additional corporate partners ready to become involved on a deeper level. For more information or to get your company involved, contact PRP Director Dale Cyphert at dale.cyphert@uni.edu.
Graduation Celebration

The University of Northern Iowa's College of Business Administration celebrated past achievements and inspired future success during the Class of 2012 Graduation Celebration on April 12, 2012.

UNIBusiness Alumni in Residence

The College's Graduation Celebration doesn't just focus on our graduating seniors. It also celebrates our Alumni in Residence — distinguished alumni from each undergraduate department who spend the day on campus and participate in Graduation Celebration events.

This year the Alumni in Residence represent four decades of our strong business education; come from companies large and small; work at the top of long-established corporations and lead young entrepreneurial ventures; and traveled anywhere from 1,900 miles to a few blocks in order to partake in the celebration.

Brenda Clancy (Accounting ’75), COO, Transamerica, Cedar Rapids, Iowa

Clancy has worked for Transamerica for 37 years, becoming executive vice president and COO in 2005. In this position she guides numerous corporate areas and works directly with the three core divisions of Transamerica with a focus on streamlining operations and implementing best practices. She is a key member of Transamerica’s executive team responsible for the development, implementation and execution of corporate strategy and the company's business plan.

Scudder's law practice is concentrated in business and finance, with a focus on mergers and acquisitions, corporate governance, securities law, SEC reporting and compliance, general contracting, and compliance with the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976. Scudder attended University of Iowa Law School after making his mark at UNI as a Presidential Scholar and president of Northern Iowa Student Government.

Ben Fogle (Finance ’99), vice president of capital markets, Farm Credit Services of America, Omaha, Neb.

In October 2012, Fogle became vice president of capital markets for Farm Credit Services of America. He was previously director of capital strategies for Jasper Stone Partners and spent 11 years with Principal Real Estate Investors in Des Moines, Iowa. He has successfully led over $2 billion of real estate transactions, as well as managed the development and implementation of investment strategies, business platforms and capital raising.

Kate Washut (MIS ’98), vice president, Far Reach, Cedar Falls, Iowa

Washut is a co-founder of and partner at Far Reach and responsible for the company’s operations management, human resources, vendor management, sales and marketing, customer relationship management, software development and project management. Washut was a finalist for the Technology Association of Iowa's Women of Innovation Entrepreneurial Innovation & Leadership Award in 2010 and 2011 and won the award in 2012. In addition to her degree in MIS, she received a psychology degree from UNI in 1990.

Mary Mehrtens-West (Marketing ’81), president, The Roy West Companies, Orlando, Fla.

Since graduating from UNI and the Iowa Military Academy ('83), Mehrtens-West served as an active duty U.S. Army officer, spent 24 years in sales executive/sales leadership/senior executive roles with Fortune 500 Companies, graduated from The Gallup Organization’s “Great Leader” Program, was selected as one of the first five non-Gallup employees ever authorized to certify Strengths Performance Coaches, and now is president and owner of her own corporation. UNIBusiness thanks the 2012 Alumni in Residence.
April 12, 2012
Throughout the day, the undergraduate Alumni in Residence visited classes, spoke to students from their respective departments and were lunch guests at the President’s House.

5:30 p.m. Class of 2012 Mixer
Prior to the Class of 2012 Forum, a mixer was held in the Hall of Flags, allowing students, faculty and alumni to network.
6 p.m. Class of 2012 Forum

Sponsored by United Fire Group

The Alumni in Residence within the College’s five undergraduate departments joined together in front of a large crowd of students and faculty for a forum, “Experience Speaks: Life after Graduation.” They reflected on their time at UNIBusiness and gave advice for a successful career.

Highlights from the Class of 2012 Forum with this year’s undergraduate Alumni in Residence:

Clancy
“The learning curve is going to be quite steep but don’t feel like you’re the only one. Don’t be afraid to ask questions. Even CEOs ask questions.”

Scudder
“I have a tendency to do too many things at one time and spread myself too thin. You run the risk of diluting your talent. Stay involved in the community around you but do it in a meaningful way.”

Fogle
“The rigor and hard work the professors make you go through trains you and prepares you for the jobs you will take on. The hard work and rigor pay off.”

Washut
“Remember, you’re not done learning when you leave here.”

Mehrtens-West
“Stand upright, be clear about what’s meaningful and what’s important to you. Don’t feel you’re not being humble enough by speaking the value you bring to the table.”
8 p.m. Class of 2012 Awards Ceremony

UNIBusiness welcomes new Executive Advisory Board members

The UNIBusiness Executive Advisory Board invited three new members to join its ranks in fall 2012. Welcome to David Petratis (Management ’81), Tim Thondson (Accounting ’83) and Mary Mehrtens-West (Marketing ’81).

The UNIBusiness Executive Advisory Board

The Dean’s Executive Advisory Board directly links UNIBusiness to the business community. This group of accomplished executives provides advice on academic programs, faculty and student development, outreach, strategic positioning and other issues of interest. Collectively and individually the members serve to strengthen the College’s reputation, improve its visibility, promote its interests and help develop its relationships with important constituents.

A Successful Student Does More Than Attend Class.

When a student wants to study abroad to learn more about international businesses and customs, wants to take classes to earn professional certification before graduation, wants to take an unpaid internship that will apply business knowledge to help the community, we want to help.

Your contributions to the Dean’s Fund for Excellence can purchase airline tickets, buy CFA seminar books, fund a scholarship and much more.
